WHY WHOLE HOUSE SURGE PROTECTION IS IMPORTANT

Odds are, a few items inside your home (like your computer, TV, DVD player and such) are plugged into multi-strip extension cords that also provide point-of-use surge protection. Most of these power strip surge protectors provide the minimum level of protection for everyday power surges. But do they provide enough protection from lightning strikes and sudden jolts of electricity? The fact is, you might want to consider a whole house surge protector. Here's why...

Any device that has a digital display or draws electricity (even in small amounts) may turn into a magnet when lightning strikes near your home. Even if lightning hits an electrical power line or transformer a half-mile away, it could send a spike down the power line that will take out everything in its path! This could amount to many thousands of dollars in damage very quickly.

Why take a chance? The only way to protect your entire house and all electronic devices in it is to install a whole house surge protector. In fact, you might want to use both, a whole house surge protector and individual power strips to safeguard all of your valuable electronics.
